A Moment of Madness: Derrida’s Kierkegaard

Geoffrey Bennington

Abstract:
Beginning with his famous 1963 lecture on Foucault, Derrida repeatedly invokes a line from Kierkegaard, often translated from his French as ‘the instant of decision is madness,’ without ever giving a precise reference or subjecting that sentence to anything like a reading in the Derridean sense. This paper tracks some of the unsuspected complexities that emerge when that sentence is located in Kierkegaard and the Pauline tradition to which Kierkegaard is appealing. It is suggested that the singular functioning of this sentence in Derrida nonetheless, in its very failure to read, shows up something of the madness, folly or stupidity at play in Kierkegaard’s thinking, and thus performs in its repetitions something of the unreadability that opens the possibility of reading itself.

À l’instant de cette lecture je vis un autre univers et je devins au autre homme. (Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Confessions)

In early 1963, responding to his reading of Jacques Derrida’s Introduction to Husserl’s Origin of Geometry, Michel Foucault wrote in a letter to Derrida, ‘sans doute l’acte premier de la philosophie est-il pour nous — et pour longtemps — la lecture: la tienne justement se donne avec évidence pour un tel acte. C’est pourquoi elle a cette royale honnêteté.’1 Just over one month later, Derrida delivered the famous lecture ‘Cogito et histoire de la folie’, to which Foucault initially responded very positively, before changing his mind and writing the bitter critique that appeared in 1971 as ‘Mon corps, ce papier, ce feu'. As late as 1983, a year or so before his death, Foucault was still dismissively criticising Derrida's reading of Plato's Phaedrus and Seventh Letter.²

My concern in this paper is not to rehearse again the detail of these exchanges, which Derrida pursued further after Foucault's death,³ and which have given rise to a great deal of sometimes rather dogged secondary discussion that would itself merit detailed historical consideration. Rather to suggest that the crux of the Derrida-Foucault exchange always was, and still is, the question of the possibility of reading and its relation to the unreadable. Derrida's general criticism of Foucault (and any Foucault-inspired historicism) would on this view come down to the claim that Foucault cannot in principle account for his own ability to read what he reads, that the 'mad' (unreadable) structure of reading itself is being closed off by the whole discursive apparatus of epistemes and archives, historical a prioris and games of truth. However powerful and impressive Foucault's readings may be, the thought would go, they are based on a blind spot with respect to the question of reading as such, what we might call the unreadable opening of reading itself.

One way to approach this question would go via the first epigraph that Derrida gave to that famous lecture, which in the original French is rendered both more mysterious by leading and trailing ellipses, and more assertive, lapidary, and even monumental by the use of capitalisation: ‘...L'Instant de la Décision est une Folie… (KIERKEGAARD).’⁴ My hypothesis will be that this strange reference to Kierkegaard concentrates a number of issues about reading, failure to read, and the unreadable, and that tracing its fate in Derrida can help us think about the moment or event of reading as such.⁵

This Kierkegaard reference is not just given this prominent position in 'Cogito and the History of Madness', but is in fact a regularly recurring one in Derrida. The same 'quotation' (if it is strictly speaking a quotation) reappears more or less textually or is more or less explicitly alluded to many times thereafter in Derrida's work, functioning as a kind of watchword or password or slogan, but never once (to my knowledge) given a precise textual reference or anything like a detailed reading. As I do not believe there is any other example of such functioning in Derrida, this 'example' becomes something more and other than a mere example, and achieves a specific kind of singularity, or could perhaps be said to come to bear Derrida’s signature. In other words, a whole reading of Derrida could no doubt be organised around “‘L’instant de la décision est une folie’ (Kierkegaard) (Derrida)’. In Donner le temps, for example (published in 1991, but based on seminar materials from 1977–8), the same tagline shows up as part of the analysis of the gift: ‘Il n’y aurait don qu’à l’instant où l’instant paradoxal (au sens où Kierkegaard dit de l’instant paradoxal de la décision qu’il est la folie) déchire le temps’ (There would be a gift only at the instant when the paradoxical instant (in the sense in which Kierkegaard says of the paradoxical instant of decision that it is madness) tears time apart). Or perhaps more famously in Forced eloi, glossing the third of three ‘aporias’ — that of an urgency interrupting the horizon of knowledge — that he associates with the just decision, Derrida says this:

Le moment de la décision, en tant que tel, ce qui doit être juste, il faut que cela reste toujours un moment fini d’urgence et de précipitation; cela ne doit pas être la conséquence ou l’effet de ce savoir théorique ou historique, de cette réflexion ou de cette délibération, dès lors que la décision marque toujours l’interruption de la délibération juridico- ou éthico- ou politico-cognitive qui la précède, et qui doit la précéder. L’instant de la décision est une folie, dit Kierkegaard. (The moment of decision as such, what must be just, must always remain a finite moment of urgency and precipitation; it must not be the consequence or the effect of (...) theoretical or historical knowledge, of (...) reflection or (...) deliberation, since the decision always marks the interruption of the juridico-, ethico-, or politico-cognitive deliberation that precedes it, that must precede it. The instant of a decision is a madness, says Kierkegaard.)

In the interview entitled ‘Dialangues’ conducted in 1983, Derrida’s interviewer, Anne Berger, suggests a possible connection between Derrida’s interest in partition or divisibility and what she refers to as ‘ce rapport d’indécision volontaire que tu sembles entretenir avec tes objets de pensée, et peut-être avec la “réalité” en general’ (that relation of voluntary indecision that you seem to maintain with the objects of your thought, and perhaps with ‘reality’ in general), provoking Derrida to gloss at some length the logic of undecidability and produce a less textually precise version of what is clearly the same reference:

C’est à partir du moment où on se rend à la nécessité de la divisibilité et de l’indécidable, que la question de la décision peut se poser ; et de savoir ce que décider, affirmer, c’est-à-dire aussi se décider, signifient ; une décision qui serait prise autrement qu’au bord de cet indécidable-là, ce ne serait pas une décision. Donc la décision la plus grave, le Pari, le Sacrifice d’Isaac, les grandes décisions qu’il faut prendre et qu’il faut affirmer se prennent et sont affirmées dans ce rapport à l’indécidable même ; au moment même où elles ne sont pas possibles, elles deviennent possibles. Ce sont les seules décisions possibles : impossibles. Pense ici à Kierkegaard. La seule décision possible, c’est la décision impossible. C’est quand il n’est pas possible de savoir ce qu’il faut faire, quand le savoir n’est pas déterminant et n’a pas à l’être, qu’une décision est possible comme telle. Autrement la décision est une application ; on sait ce qu’il faut faire, c’est clair, il n’y a plus de décision possible ; il y a là un effet, une application, une programmation.

(It is from the moment one surrenders to the necessity of divisibility and the undecidable that the question of decision can be posed: and the question of knowing what deciding, affirming — which is to say, also deciding — mean. A decision that would be taken otherwise than on the border of this undecidable would not be a decision. Thus the gravest decision — the Wager, the Sacrifice of Isaac — the great decisions that must be taken and must be affirmed are taken and affirmed in this relation to the undecidable itself; at the very moment at which they are no longer possible, they become possible. These are the only decisions possible — impossible ones. Think here of Kierkegaard: the only decision possible is the impossible decision. It is when it is not possible to know what must be done, when knowledge is not and cannot be determining that a decision is possible as such. Otherwise the decision is an application, one knows what has to be done, it's clear, there is no more decision possible; what one has here is an effect, an application, a programming.)

Again, in the important lecture first given in English as “The Principle of Reason: The University in the Eyes of its Pupils”, Derrida invokes this same moment from Kierkegaard to describe the temporality of reflection:

(Then the time of reflection is also an other time; it is heterogeneous to what it reflects and perhaps gives time for what calls for and what is called thinking. It is the chance for an event about which one does not know whether or not, presenting itself within the University, it belongs to the history of the University. It may also be brief and paradoxical, it may tear time apart, like the instant invoked by Kierkegaard, one of those thinkers who are foreign, even hostile to the University, who give us more to think about, with respect to the essence of the University, than academic reflections themselves.)

No explicit invocation of ‘folie’ here, but that motif is never far to seek, even though Kierkegaard may not always explicitly be named: so in Sauf le nom (1993), we find:

Aller où il est possible d’aller, ce ne serait pas un déplacement ou une décision, ce serait le déroulement irresponsable d’un programme. La seule décision possible passe par la folie de l’indécidable et de l’impossible. (Going where it is possible to go would not be a displacement or a decision, it would be the irresponsible unfolding of a program. The sole decision possible passes through the madness of the undecidable and the impossible.)

And, as a final preliminary example, an interview from 1991 whose title, ‘Une “folie” doit veiller sur la pensée’, is derived from a comment late in the interview which again associates the moment (this time the moment of invention) and folie, ‘Cela doit s’inventer à chaque instant, à chaque phrase, sans assurance, sans garde-fou absolu. Autant dire que la folie, une certaine “folie”, doit guetter chaque pas, et au fond veiller sur la pensée, comme le fait aussi la raison’ (This has to be invented at every moment, with every sentence, without assurance, without absolute guardrails. Which is as much as to say that madness, a certain ‘madness’ must keep a lookout over every step, and finally watch over thinking, as reason does also). 11

‘Une certaine folie’, rather than LA folie, perhaps, because this often repeated, more or less direct, more or less textual reference to Kierkegaard and madness is a little more complicated than might at first appear. Each of the contexts in which it appears (we will look at a couple more occurrences in due course) would of course need analysis in its own right, but Derrida’s repeated reference, by its persistence and precision but lack of direct attribution, gives one the impression that it is a memory of his ‘early’ reading of Kierkegaard, of a moment of reading, precisely, something like a snapshot or screen memory of a (traumatic) event rather than a scholarly reference (everything indeed suggests that Derrida has forgotten where he read it). The sentence in question appears in fact mid-way through Kierkegaard’s Philosophical Fragments, pseudonymously attributed to Johannes Climacus. The sentence Derrida is remembering and almost compulsively quoting without ever explicitly relocating it is indeed translated into French by Paul Petit as ‘L’instant de la décision est folie’. One’s understanding of this sentence or slogan does, however, change a little once it is read in that context and once what is at stake in this translation is more carefully measured. In the now standard English translation of the Fragments by Howard and Edna Hong, the sentence becomes ’the moment of decision is foolishness’, which has to say the least a slightly different ring to it. The word translated as folie by Petit is the Danish Daarskab (nowadays written Dårskab), which is indeed more readily translated into English as either folly or foolishness than as madness. In the German translation of Kierkegaard we find ‘der Augenblick der Entscheidung ist eine Torheit’, rather than, say, Irrsinn or Narrheit or Wahnsinn. But the potential contrast between Dårskab and other modalities of madness or craziness are quite active in Kierkegaard’s text from the start, so that, for example, the more extreme forms appear explicitly in the book’s foreword in criticism of the Hegelian Martensen:

Of course it is impossible for anyone to dream of attributing world-historical significance to a pamphlet (...) for this to happen, the guilty person would have to be singularly stupid [Danish dum; German dumm; French stupide] by nature, and, most likely, by yelling day in and day out in antistrophic antiphonies every time someone deluded him into thinking that now a new era, a new epoch, etc. was beginning, he would have so completely bellowed the sparsely bestowed quantum satis of common sense out of his head that he would have been transported into a state of bliss, into what could be called the howling madness of the higher lunacy [Danish den høiere Galenskabs vræelende Uffindighed; German den brüllenden Wahnsinn des höheren Irrsinns; French la démence braillante de l’aberration supérieure], symptomatized by yelling, convulsive yelling, while the sum and substance of the yelling are these words: era, epoch, era and epoch, epoch and era, the system. (PF, 6)

In the context in which the ‘moment of madness’ sentence appears, Kierkegaard’s point is not to proclaim or affirm or celebrate some kind of creative, anguished or otherwise existentially authentic ‘madness’ of the decision, as one might perhaps have been forgiven for thinking on reading Derrida’s various invocations of it, but to bring out its specifically and stubbornly paradoxical nature: as opposed to the Socratic account of learning (especially in the Meno) which famously resolves the paradox of learning (that one cannot seek what one knows because one already knows it, and one cannot seek what one does not know because one does not know what one is seeking) by the concept of anamnesis, in which the occasion of learning is indifferent. Kierkegaard proposes what he calls a 'thought-project' in which that occasion would become important, indeed decisive, because in that moment the eternal would come into existence in the temporal. If, then (as Kierkegaard consistently formulates it according to the logic of the thought-project, the hypothesis), if one were to try to answer the Socratic question (how is learning possible?) differently, then one would need to register a number of consequences:

Now if the moment is to acquire decisive significance, then the seeker up until that moment must not have possessed the truth, not even in the form of ignorance, for in that case the moment becomes merely the moment of occasion; indeed he must not even be a seeker. (...) Consequently, he has to be defined as being outside the truth (...) or as untruth. He is, then, untruth. (PF, 13)

The argument now goes as follows: if the truth is to be brought about, the conditions for understanding it must also be provided (for ex anti-Socratic hypothesis those conditions cannot be already in the learner). No merely human teacher can provide those conditions, which require a radical transformation of the learner, which must come from somewhere other (for otherwise those conditions could be in the learner already). Further, as created by a God who must have given him the conditions for the truth (otherwise he would be a mere animal), the learner must have come to lack those conditions through his own doing: and this coming-to-lack Kierkegaard calls sin. If the learner could simply regain the conditions of truth under his own steam, as it were, then again the Moment as such would vanish in that it would be merely the contingent occasion for the realisation of that possibility that was already given in advance: the learner as sinner may have freely chosen sin (i.e. unfreedom) in the first instance, but is then bound to continue to do so — having once chosen unfreedom, freedom is bound to the increase of that unfreedom. So any teacher who was able to provide again the initially God-given conditions of truth along with the truth they make comprehensible would have to be regarded as more than a mere teacher, but as a savior, a deliverer, a reconciler, and in the end a judge (PF, 17–18). The moment (which Climacus says must be unforgettable because otherwise the learner would simply relapse into loss of truth and its condition from which only the re-defined teacher has allowed him to emerge) — the moment in which this return of truth and its conditions to the learner takes place is, then, the moment of decision:

A moment such as this is unique. To be sure, it is short and temporal, as the moment is; it is passing, as the moment is, past, as the moment is in the next moment, and yet it is decisive, and yet it is filled with the eternal. A moment such as this must have a special name. Let us call it: the fullness of time. (PF, 18)

This is still only an intermediate step in the process that will lead us to the ‘absolute paradox’ and the Dårskab, Torheit, folie or foolishness that we are trying to understand in the sentence Derrida is so fond of invoking. This characterisation of the moment is unequivocally referred by Climacus to St. Paul, and more especially to Galatians 4:4, ‘But when the fullness of the time (πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου) was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, 5To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.’ We shall return to that Pauline reference shortly.

This much on the side of the teacher. On the side of the ‘learner’ or disciple, the moment of decision occurs as a moment of conversion or rebirth, as a radical break without return, which Climacus suggests is scarcely thinkable at all, and that it is his project or proposal to try to think or at least to approach. (Again, this comes close to some form of madness: without it yet being the phrase that we are approaching, a further imaginary interlocutor describes the whole project here as ‘ludicrous’ and ‘foolish’ (PF, 21), where ‘foolish’ translates tårbelige, which in German becomes Törichste and in French une sottise.) Climacus now tightens up the paradoxical nature of this perhaps unthinkable thing he is trying to think: whereas in the Socratic set-up there is essentially a symmetry or reciprocity between teacher and learner (such that each is the occasion for the other to understand himself), the god (who we have already established replaces the teacher in the non-Socratic hypothesis) is not in any relation of reciprocity with the ‘learner’, and so must be understood to act, when he acts, out of pure love. Further, the god, being a god (Climacus quotes the famous Aristotelian definition, áρχειν οί πάντα χίναι from the Metaphysics (1072b)) must necessarily be resolved from all eternity, ‘even though, fulfilled in time, it expressly becomes the moment (…) The moment emerges precisely in the relation of the eternal resolution to the unequal occasion’ (PF, 25).18

This paradox is what will lead us to the slogan-phrase so often repeated by Derrida. Climacus is quite clear that ‘paradox is the passion of thought’, and the ‘ultimate paradox of thought’ is ‘to want to discover something that thought cannot think’ (PF, 37). This something is the unknown: let us, says Climacus (PF, 39) call it the god. The god escapes knowledge in the sense of any proof of existence:

if (…) the god does not exist, then of course it is impossible to demonstrate it. But if he does exist, then it is foolishness [Dårskab, the word we are coming to] to want to demonstrate it, since I, in the very moment the demonstration commences, would presuppose it as not doubtful (…) but as decided, because otherwise I would not begin. (PF, 39)

In proceeding with an attempted demonstration, I will always fail to bridge the gap between ideality (God as a concept, which I can develop or explicate only having presupposed its ideal being) and existence, which I can never in any case conclude by reasoning. While I am reasoning in the effort to prove the existence of God, that existence is not proven (because I am still demonstrating it); when I finish my demonstration, the existence does not flow continuously from my reasoning but, says Climacus, ‘the existence is there’ (PF, 43), in a leap. This situation, which Climacus illustrates as that of a ‘wise’ man who keeps putting off the demonstration because it is impossible, and which a note describes as ‘a superb theme for a crazy comedy’ [vanvitige Comik; wahnwitzige Komik; sujet de comique délirant] (PF, 43), comes about because in demonstrating, or attempting to demonstrate, the understanding encounters a limit or a frontier [Grœndsen, Grenze, frontière], and just that is the experience of the unknown. The frontier involves an encounter with the absolutely different, but an encounter that is not really even an encounter, ‘because the understanding cannot even think the absolutely different’, in that it can have no distinguishing mark to identify it as the absolutely different. If the god is conceived of as anything more or other than the frontier itself, then ‘the one idea about the different is confused with the many ideas about the different’ (PF, 45), and we are in dispersion, scatter, for which Climacus provides the loaded Greek term διαμορφωσις, and glosses in poikilon-like terms as an attractive and seductive fantasy. This would be the ‘capricious arbitrariness’ that ‘madly [vanvittigen; wahnsinnig] lurks’ at the bottom of devoutness or more literally the fear of God (in French, it is ‘l’insensé, le lunatique arbitraire’), and gives rise to the luxuriant, fantastical fabrications of paganism. And this shows up as at the frontier, or as the impasse of understanding that Climacus is tightening up into the ‘absolute paradox’:

The understanding cannot come to know this by itself (since, as we have seen, it is a contradiction); if it is going to come to know this, it must come to know this from the god, and if it does come to know this, it cannot understand this and consequently cannot come to know this, for how could it understand the absolutely different? (...) If the god is absolutely different from a human being, then a human being is absolutely different from the god — but how is the understanding to grasp this? At this point we seem to stand at a paradox. (PF, 46)

The experience of the paradox is the experience of an offense or an affront: the understanding is offended by the paradox against which it has struggled, ‘offense comes into existence with the paradox; if it comes into existence, here again we have the moment, around which indeed everything revolves. (…) All offense is in its essence a misunderstanding of the moment, since it is indeed offense at the paradox, and the paradox in turn is the moment’ (PF, 51).

We are almost at the phrase that Derrida so often cites or invokes. Before coming directly to it, it is worth pointing out a footnote just a little earlier that attempts to clarify the nature of offense as suffering (the footnote is called by a paragraph that suggests that the distinction between suffering offense and active offense is a fragile one), and in so doing invokes the Greek concept of σκάνδαλον, which will be with us again very shortly:

Language usage also shows that all offense is a suffering. We say ’to be offended’, which primarily signifies only the state, but we synonymously say: to take offense (the identity of the suffering [Lidené] and the acting). In Greek it is σκάνδαλιζεσθαι. This word comes from σκάνδαλον (offense, affront) and thus means to take affront. Here the direction is clear; it is not the offense that affronts but the offense that takes affront, therefore passively [passive], even though so actively that it itself takes affront. The understanding, therefore, has not itself originate the offense, for the paradoxical affront that the isolated understanding develops discovers neither the paradox nor the offense. (PF, 50n) 22

So here we are with the understanding offended or affronted by the paradox of the moment. This is essentially the moment as seen from the Socratic position with which we began, and which has to consider the moment as the mere inessential and vanishing occasion in the dialectical account of teaching and learning as essentially anamnesia. From this point of view, the moment ’does not exist, has not been, and will not come’ (PF, 52). The learner is already the truth and simply has to remember that truth: so from this Socratic point of view, the moment looks like a ’jest’ [Spøg; Scherz; frime], a joke, and so the moment of decision is (mere) foolishness. ’The moment of decision is foolishness.’ L’instant de la décision est une folie’ is thus not, as one might have been forgiven for thinking on reading Derrida’s apparently enthusiastic endorsements or countersignings of it, Kierkegaard’s, nor even Climacus’s, direct characterisation of the moment, but their characterisation of the Socratic view of it, i.e. the view that the whole point of the Fragments is to contest, at least hypothetically, according to the though-project. If we want to think non-Socratically about the possibility of learning, then we have to foreground the moment and embrace the paradox, and this we do not prima facie seem to do by simply adopting the Socratic position that characterises the moment as mere jest or foolishness. The moment of decision is ridiculous, it’s a joke, says the Socratic position, dismissively. So among the in fact rather differentiated and refined vocabulary of madness, lunacy, craziness, and folly that we have encountered in these opening pages of the Philosophical Fragments, it seems that this instance cannot simply be grasped as readily or straightforwardly as we might have thought with the word ‘folie’[^23], still less with the term ‘madness’, and that the complex organisation of the text does not at all invite the reader to adopt it as the truth, still less to make of it a slogan to be repeated as Kierkegaard’s true insight into what he calls ‘the moment of decision’, the Øieblir or Augenblick. At first approach, then, it seems as though Derrida, probably on the basis of an impressionable youthful reading only partially remembered, has quite mistaken the sense and intention of Kierkegaard/Climacus’s point, and inadvertently sided with those who take offense at the paradox or think it a scandal: ‘the expression of offense is that the moment is foolishness, the paradox is foolishness’ (PF, 52).

Before seeing whether this initial diagnosis is justified, let us pause for a moment and remember Climacus’s use of the Greek σκάνδαλον in the slightly earlier footnote to characterise the offence. Not implausibly, the slogan-sentence we have been working towards is given a footnote by Howard and Edna Hong, which reads simply: ‘See I Corinthians 1:23.’[^24] That famous verse reads: ‘But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness [ ἐμεῖς δὲ κηρύσσομεν Χριστὸν ἐσταυρωμένον, Ἰουδαῖος μὲν σκάνδαλον ἐννοεῖν δὲ μωρῆσθαι].’[^25] So although Kierkegaard is opposing his hypothetical thinking of the moment essentially to the Greeks (in the shape of Socrates), for whom the preaching of Christ crucified is indeed foolishness (of which we shall be seeing a good deal more in St. Paul in a moment), the immediately preceding footnote glossing the offense as σκάνδαλον, translated in the King James Bible as ‘stumblingblock’, invites the thought that there is in fact a double reference to this verse in the Fragments, and that, not surprisingly perhaps, a Judaic position on the moment is no more promising than the Greek.[^26] All of this becomes clearer if we look at a little more context for the quote from I Corinthians, from a self-distancing of Paul’s preaching from any mere ‘wisdom of words’ [σοφία λόγου], i.e. the words of Greek philosophy or sophistry, to the repetition of that motif in 2:1 and the reminder of the source of the title of one of Kierkegaard’s best-known works:

For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? for after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weakness of God is stronger than men.
things that are: 29 That no flesh should glory in his presence.
30 But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption:
31 That, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

2:1 And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. 2 For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. 3 And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling.

The repeated motif of foolishness is critical to the passage, and already in Paul the object of some quite complex rhetorical irony and even free indirect discourse: the preaching of the cross (which is not to use the 'wisdom of words', i.e. a rhetorical or ratiocinative use of language) seems foolish to those who perish; and those who perish are indeed the 'wise' whose 'wisdom' is of the same order as the wisdom of words, i.e. the wisdom of the world, but who thereby are rendered themselves genuinely foolish ('hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world'), in an inversion that continues: because the 'wisdom' of the world did not know God, God chose the 'foolishness' of preaching (i.e. a preaching that looked foolish from the point of view of the 'wisdom' that really is foolishness). This overturning of the value of foolishness essentially affects the relation with the Greeks ('the Greeks seek after wisdom', which is the definition of philosophy itself), although a similar inversion as to the 'signs' required by the Jews (the scribe, the γραμματεύς) is also implied: those who see that the 'foolishness' of preaching is not in fact foolishness (not so much because they understand as because they are 'called') but its opposite, wisdom (and power, which presumably answers the Jews here rather than the Greeks), are those who will be saved when the time that is at hand is fulfilled.

The major axis for the rhetoric of the passage, dominating that of high/low and weak/powerful, is indeed that of wisdom/foolishness, σοφία/μορία. Confirming what we were saying earlier about translation in this semantic zone, μορία, the only occurrences of which in the Greek New Testament are in fact to be found here in I Corinthians, is systematically translated, as we have seen, by ‘foolishness’ in English, by ‘Torheit’ in German (Luther included), but, in the Romance languages, by ‘folie’ in French (be it by Martin, Bovet Bonner, Crampon or Segond), by ‘locura’ in Spanish, and by ‘pazzia’ in Italian. And in Danish by Dårskab, the same word Climacus uses in the phrase we have been turning around. To the Greeks, the preaching of the cross is just foolishness, a joke. 29 To the extent that Climacus is indeed implicitly referring to this passage from St. Paul, then both the English translation as ‘foolishness’, and the French as ‘folie’ seem fully justified and justifiable on philological grounds. Insofar as one might be inclined to be suspicious of Derrida’s apparently uncritical appropriation of this passage or slogan, then, that suspicion would have to be centered not on his simple use of the word folie, but in his apparently direct and — quite uncharacteristically for one usually so highly attentive to all the details of text and context, to the status and rhetorical complexity of the texts he reads, and attentive just because of a kind of citational escape-velocity with respect to context that he also diagnoses and that in fact makes reading possible30 — entirely unproblematised attribution to Kierkegaard of a thought that is not only pseudonymous (the Philosophical Fragments are signed by Johannes Climacus31), radically hypothetical (within the framework of a ‘Thought-Project’ which is entirely in the form of an ‘if...then’ structure) but within that pseudonymous and hypothetical structure is presenting the thought that the moment of decision is Dårskab not even as the thought of that pseudonymous author, but representing it as the position taken by an imaginary Socratic interlocutor who is somewhat in the position of the ‘Greek’ as that position is established by St. Paul in I Corinthians. The moment of decision, on this view, would be, properly understood, not in fact a moment of Dårskab at all, but a moment of a higher wisdom that transcends the pseudo-wisdom (the wisdom of the world, the σοφία of rhetor, sophist, or dialectician alike), to which it only appears as μορφή, foolishness, because that worldly wisdom is not σοφία at all but itself the real or true foolishness.

But perhaps this complexity of double pseudonymy (not Kierkegaard directly, but the Socratic figure via Climacus) and chiasmatic reversal (not in fact foolishness but higher wisdom) itself bespeaks a kind of ‘madness’ that is being condensed in the slogan version that Derrida habitually gives of the phrase. ‘L’instant de la décision est une folie’ might then be read as (no doubt unconsciously, still under the ‘impression’ of that early reading of Kierkegaard) picking up in a further reflexive move the ‘madness’ of this whole set-up as we have laboriously reconstructed it through the opening pages of the Philosophical Fragments with their deployment of different valences of the mad, the crazy and the foolish, and their internal allusion to I Corinthians’s complex inversion of at least some of those values. Not only would the moment of decision itself be foolish when viewed from a Socratic perspective, but the whole ‘moment of decision’ discussion as set up by Climacus/Kierkegaard would bespeak a kind of craziness when seen from that same perspective. Here the thought would be that not only is Kierkegaard proposing a non-Socratic theory of the moment, but is also doing so in a distinctly non-Socratic way or manner, such that the reader qua reader becomes entangled in paradox, confusion and apparent absurdity and cannot entirely philosophise it away. Kierkegaard’s text is in a certain sense unreadable. In such a hypothesis, one might either try to untangle, as philosophically as possible, that confusion (which is, as the references to madness in the Foreword suggest, not mere confusion, not simply the ravings of a lunatic (that being the fate, rather, of the Hegelian in Climacus’s anecdote, which itself repeats the structure of the chiasmatic reversal of I Corinthians, such that the height of a certain rationalism becomes the height of foolishness and indeed this time true madness), somewhat along the lines of what we have been doing here, or else one might imagine taking seriously the structure of the irruptive moment as thematised in the text and apply it to one’s reading or reception of the text. A ‘momentary’ rather than strictly expository reading of this text about the structure of the moment might then, in not exactly a deliberate or calculated gesture, extract a phrase and endow it with the force or virtue of the moment of decision itself: at that point, the event as much as the content of the slogan ‘L’instant de la décision est une folie’ might function as a moment in precisely the strong sense the text of the Philosophical Fragments is promoting. What is apparently the worst reading, or simply an absence of reading (taking that sentence literally as a direct proposition immediately attributable to Søren Kierkegaard, reading it as a thesis about the moment that says that the moment is madness and then quoting it repeatedly as a truth) might then, in a further paradoxical twist, manage to perform or do the moment, in its strict unreadability, more accurately or faithfully than the explicative and rationalising reading that I have been performing here. That demonstrably ‘bad’ reading would then not really be a reading at all, as is further evidenced by the fact that Derrida’s most sustained published discussion of Kierkegaard, in The Gift of Death, which is a reading, still includes the erratic block of this ‘unread’ and, as always, unreferenced quotation of the ‘slogan’ we are tracking: commenting there on a passage from Fear and Trembling, Derrida draws attention to the word instant (in the French translation: ‘moment’ in the English), and adds, ‘J’ai souligné le mot instant: “l’instant de la décision est la folie”, dit ailleurs Kierkegaard.’ But in not even being a reading, Derrida’s apparent mere repetition or even incantation of this slogan would have captured something of the event-nature of the moment in its Pauline-Kierkegaardian sense (as opposed to its Socratic characterisation as mere occasion), as an event with the quality of a break, a trauma, a conversion, a radical ‘impression’ or imprint, a turning-point or rupture in the history of the young Jacques Derrida, itself a moment of folie then subject to regular rememorative or perhaps compulsive repetition throughout his work, in memory of that unforgettable yet somewhat forgotten event. ‘L’instant de la decision est une folie’ est une folie.

This understanding of what the repeated event of ‘L’instant de la decision est une folie’ is doing in Derrida can then also be the object, in its repetitions, of some displacement and re-reading which are part of its structure. For example, in one of its apparent iterations in Derrida, which does not explicitly mention Kierkegaard, it is glossed in a way that is much more ‘correct’ in that now it is explicitly registered that the moment of decision only appears to be Dårskab from a philosophical (for Climacus, a Socratic) or rationalistic perspective: in Politiques de l’amitié, contemporaneous with Force de Loi, we find this, claiming that the concept of the subject cannot at all help one understand the decision:

Faudrait-il se montrer hospitalier pour l’impossible même, à savoir ce que le bon sens de toute philosophie ne peut qu’exclure comme la folie ou le non-sens, à savoir une décision passive, une décision originairement affectée ? Un hôte aussi indésirable ne peut s’avancer dans l’espace
From (or perhaps into) the point of view of good, sound common sense and philosophy, the decision irrupts and interrupts like madness or nonsense, entailing something unthinkable like a passive decision, a decision not taken by me but by the other in me, the event of alterity itself, a reading in which it is not exactly I who reads, something unreadable to me as supposed subject of reading.

If Dārskab as foolishness, as jest or joke or absurdity, thus at least communicates — in one direction, as it were — with madness as non-sense or craziness, Wahnsinn, it also communicates, in the other, with a certain stupidity. The event leaves me dumbstruck, unable to speak (like the Abraham depicted in Fear and Trembling), stupefied, stupid. For the Greeks, the moment is μωρία, says Paul, using a term whose cognate moron would, many centuries later, in 1910 to be precise, be adopted as a clinical term by the American Association for the Study of the Feeble-minded. Like the understanding at the frontier described by Climacus, there is, faced with the moment of decision, a moronic moment, a moment of stupidity as well as of crazy or fantastical elucubration. And in the last explicit iteration of this Kierkegaardian reference in Derrida’s work, madness is indeed now explicitly associated with stupidity, with bêtise.

What Avital Ronell sees clearly and what matters to us here, is that if ‘stupidity’ (and I must keep the English word) is neither a concept nor a nonconcept but, as she says, a quasi-concept (and this concept of the ‘quasi’, of the ‘as if’, carries the whole charge of the equivocation), this hangs on the fact that it has no status, by which we have to understand both no stability and no legitimacy accredited once and for all: and this nonstatus depends on an undecidability, an indeterminacy, of course, but not any old indeterminacy or any old indecision. It makes your head spin. The point is that it is a matter of an indecision or an indeterminacy between a determinacy and an indeterminacy. So that to link up more visibly and clearly with the problematic of sovereignty that actually has not left us, I would be tempted to say that any decision (and sovereignty is a power of absolute decision) is both mad (every decision is madness, says Kierkegaard) and bête, or stupid, that it involves a risk of, or a leaning toward, bêtise.

Madness and stupidity, the risk of reading.

1 ‘No doubt the primary act of philosophy is for us — and for some time to come — reading: yours clearly presents itself as such an act. Which is why it has that royal honesty.’ Michel Foucault, letter to Jacques Derrida, 27 January 1963, quoted in Benoît Peeters, Derrida (Paris, Flammarion, 2010), p. 164. Just over a month later, Derrida gave the lecture ‘Cogito et histoire de la folie’. See Foucault’s subsequent letters quoted in Peeters, pp. 167 and 168 for his initially very positive reaction to the lecture.

3 See ‘Etre juste avec Freud’, in Résistances: de la psychanalyse (Paris, Galilée, 1996), 93–146. I pursue the late Foucault’s analysis of parrhesia, and his awkward attempt to disengage it from rhetoric, in the longer essay of which this is an extract.

4 In Alan Bass’s translation (‘The Instant of Decision is Madness’ (Kierkegaard)), the sentence loses its ellipses and Kierkegaard all but his initial capitalisation, but the quotation itself is still capitalised as though it were a title. See Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference, trans, Alan Bass (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1978), 31.

5 See a very rich, idiosyncratic and fascinating discussion of much that is to follow in John Llewelyn, Margins of Religion: Between Kierkegaard and Derrida (Bloomington, IN, Indiana University Press, 2009), especially Chapter 1, entitled ‘On the Borderline of Madness’, 8–30. Llewelyn quotes the original formulation of this sentence in Kierkegaard, but does not point to the unreferenced repetition of this tag line across Derrida’s work, though he does open on a quotation of Derrida saying ‘But it is Kierkegaard to whom I have been the most faithful’. (From Jacques Derrida and Maurizio Ferraris A taste for the secret, tr., Giacomo Donis (Cambridge, Polity Press, 2001), 40; in that book it is Maurizio Ferraris who quotes back to Derrida the ‘instant of decision is madness’ line that will be preoccupying us (Ibid., 24). Llewelyn moves more mercurially, and with more alacrity than I, across the different valencies of ‘madness’ at play here.

12 See Bennington and Derrida, Jacques Derrida, 2nd edition (Paris, Seuil, 2009), 272, where the entire entry for the years 1948–9 reads ‘L’orientation vers la philosophie se précise. Lecture “impressionnée” de Kierkegaard et de Heidegger’; translated by Geoffrey Bennington (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1993), ‘The movement towards philosophy takes shape. “Awed” reading of Kierkegaard and Heidegger’ (p. 328). Being ‘impressionné’ in French is more than merely being ‘impressed’ and has a sense of being awestruck and perhaps overwhelmed, near the thaumazein with which philosophy is said to begin.

15 Søren Kierkegaard, Philosophical Fragments, edited and translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong (Princeton NJ, Princeton University Press, 1985), 52 (hereinafter PF). The original Danish text reads ‘Afgjørelsens Øieblik er en Daarskab.’ The earlier translation by David Swenson has ‘folly’ for Daarskab, as also quoted by Llewelyn, p. 11.

17 PF, 11, and especially 13: ‘The temporal point of departure is a nothing, because in the same moment I discover that I have known the truth from eternity without knowing it, in the same instant that moment is hidden in the eternal, assimilated into it in such a way that I, so to speak, still cannot find it even if I were to look for it, because there it is no Here and no There, but only a ubique et nusquam [everywhere and nowhere].’
In the longer essay of which this is a part, I discuss Heidegger’s complaint that in presenting his moment in this way, Kierkegaard is still working with a metaphysical view of time, and (with some help from Derrida’s reading of Husserl’s Augenblick in La voix et le phénomène) try to show that Heidegger’s own Augenblick of Entschlossenheit is closer to Kierkegaard’s than Heidegger might want to admit.

Precisely this thought of the ‘absolutely different’ would depart from Hegel, who thinks that absolute difference must collapse back into identity because difference is already becoming opposition, contradiction and sublation (so that it is possible to think the absolute), and bear comparison with what Heidegger means by ‘the nothing’.

Poikilon is the dominant term used by Plato to describe the superficially colourful and multifarious charms of democracy in the Republic (557c), and is also the root of the term poikilochromon chosen by the translators of the septuagint for the many-colouredness of Joseph’s coat (Genesis 37:3).

In Petit’s French translation, the word Forargelsen, translated in English as ‘offence’, is straightforwardly translated as scandale.

It is true that compared to the Germanic languages, French (along with the other romance languages) suffers from a relative paucity of candidate words in this domain: where German, for example, has at the very least Narheit, Irrsinn, Torheit and Wahnsinn at its disposal, and English has a relatively clear distinction between madness and folly or foolishness, French seems to have fewer non-slang terms available. Foucault’s book Histoire de la folie à l’âge classique can be reasonably be translated into English as History of Madness, but if someone wrote in English a History of Foolishness it is not clear how that would translate into French: Erasmus’s Praise of Folly (Moriae encomium, Laus stultitiae) becomes simply Eloge de la folie in French translation. For a germane discussion of the vocabulary of stupidity or bêtise, from which we are not far and to which we shall be moving closer in a moment, see Derrida’s seminar La bête et le souverain I, session 6.

A page or so later in Climacus’s text, an imaginary objection on the grounds of plagiarism identifies Tertullian, Hamann, Shakespeare and Luther as sources for a number for formulations that immediately follow the one we are interested in, but does not mention St. Paul.
Quoted more or less verbatim elsewhere by Kierkegaard: see Concluding Unscientific Postscript to Philosophical Fragments, tr. Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong (Princeton, NJ, Princeton University Press, 1992), 598: ‘This much is certain — if a little child (literally understood) is to provide the definition of what Christianity is, then there is no terror; it is not that fact that was an offense to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks’.

There is an oblique and sardonic reference to the Jews a little earlier in the Philosophical Fragments: ‘There was a people who had a good understanding of the divine; this people believed that to see the god was death’ (PF, 30).

Verse 19, that says ‘For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent’ seems to be alluding to Isaiah 29:14, where God says ‘I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid.’

See Alain Badiou, Saint Paul, la fondation de l’universalisme (Paris, PUF, 1997), p. 62, who rather flattens out the complexity of the rhetorical gestures of this passage. I criticise Badiou’s reading of Paul (and indeed of Kierkegaard, Heidegger and Derrida too) in the longer essay of which this is a part.

Whence the fact that the philosophers find Paul so amusing, according to Acts 17:18 and 17:32, as perhaps slightly over-read by Badiou in Saint Paul, p. 62.

The locus classicus of that demonstration is the essay ‘Signature, événement, contexte’, in Marges — de la philosophie (Paris, Minuit, 1972).

Johannes Climacus is in fact more than simply a pseudonym, not simply because of Kierkegaard’s explicit and complex reflections on his own practice of pseudonymy, but also because he is not only presented as a fictional author, but is also the object of a text (admittedly unfinished and unpublished by Kierkegaard) in which he is the main character: Johannes Climacus or, De Omnibus Dubitandum Est, subtitled ‘a narrative’, which tells the story of the young Climacus’s attempt to understand the relation of doubt to philosophy, and which we might have expected to be of interest to Derrida, not only because of its engagement with Cartesian doubt, the major focus of the lecture on Foucault from which we began, but also because one of its guiding issues is the difficulty philosophy has in thinking ‘a beginning that [is] simultaneously historical and eternal’ (PF, 134–5): this is, formally speaking, exactly the question of Derrida’s early thesis on Husserl, and of his Introduction to Husserl’s Origin of Geometry.

emphasized the word instant — "the instant of decision is madness", Kierkegaard says elsewhere.

36 I imagine there might be more examples to be found in the as-yet unpublished seminars: see for example in the session of 9 November 1994, opening the seminar Secret Témoignage: ‘c’est ça la décision testimoniale — décision impossible ; quand quelque part, on dit que l’instant de la décision est une folie, il peut aussi penser à cela.’ In the fifth session of the 1991–2 seminar ‘Répondre du secret’ (5 January 1992), Derrida quotes at length from the Philosophical Fragments on the question of witnessing Christ, and refers this to the ‘paradoxe de l’instant’, without however quoting (in the written text of the seminar at least) the sentence we have been following here.
